Wayne Chandai: ADSO Director of Communications

I currently work for Lambeth as their Democratic Services Manager, and have been in that team for the last 10 years. Starting out as an Admin Assistant, I worked my way through scrutiny and democratic services and was appointed as the team manager in January 2015. I have extensive experience in democratic engagement, member development, youth council development, elections, and wider corporate governance. More recently I have taken on additional responsibilities as Head of the Chief Executive's office which at Lambeth was a natural extension to my role as Democratic Services Manager.

In the past I have been involved with similar membership organisations. I became involved in ADSO in early 2011 this was following my work in digital engagement that became recognised by the then board and I was asked to assist with their communications strategy. My role with ADSO developed from there and following the Director of Communications role becoming vacant, I was successful in a member ballot to fulfil those responsibilities. I feel immensely proud and privileged to be chosen to do this role, although the list was very short.

ADSO allows me to learn, explore and share my experience around digital engagement and communications. I am passionate about the work of ADSO and am always looking for ways to further enhance what we do through collaborative means and am always aiming to provide high quality support to our members.
